ENGIE wins a concession for transmission lines in Brazil representing an estimated investment of around EUR500 million

On Friday 16 December, ENGIE Brazil won an auction carried out by the National Power Agency (ANEEL) for the concession of 1,146 km long transmission lines in Paraná State. The company won the dispute by offering a discount of 35% against the lowest annual revenue allowed by the regulatory agency. The duration of the concession will be of 30 years, including the construction, assembly, operation and maintenance of transmission facilities.

The venture will require about EUR500 million in investments, with an estimated creation of more than 4,000 direct jobs. The lot integrates eight new transmission lines, complementary stretches and the installation of five power substations.

With an installed capacity of more than 11 GW, ENGIE is the largest private power producer in Brazil. 90% of the Group's installed capacity in the country come from clean, renewable sources, with low emissions of greenhouse gases. This low carbon dynamic has been reinforced by the construction of new wind farms in the Northeast and by the operation of one of the largest hydropower plants in Brazil, Jirau (3,750 MW), located in the Madeira River, Rondônia.

The Group is also present in Brazil in the solar distributed generation market and offers services related to energy efficiency, engineering and integration of systems working on the development of telecommunication and security systems, public lighting and urban mobility for smart cities.
